Let Me Touch By Lucia Jordan

When Chardonnay Selby arrives at the hotel, she immediately spots two men holding white roses—the object that her work friend Cecily told her would distinguish her blind-date from everyone else. She assumes that her guy is the one who's dressed more casually, in jeans and sport coat, but she soon realizes her man is the complete opposite, dressed in a fine-tailored suit, waiting with the air of confidence of the man who owns the place. His name is Stephan Hale, and though he doesn't own the hotel, Chardonnay quickly learns that he's just as suave as he is in complete control of everything.

Stephan begins to explore the object he's admiring all night long, and he decides to take her to a botanical garden where he's sure they'll have privacy. But will Chardonnay put a stop to the evening before things even really get going? Will she allow herself to submit to Stephan and his dominant touch in the way her body is telling her to? And what will happen when Chardonnay and Stephan realize that the details behind their blind date aren't exactly what they seemed to be?
